Local Market Overview

Clarksville is a city in Middle Tennessee, roughly 45–60 minutes northwest of downtown Nashville along the I-24 corridor. It functions as a regional employment and services hub for Montgomery County and surrounding communities, with steady in-migration tied to job growth, proximity to Nashville, and the presence of Fort Campbell. The local housing market includes a mix of established neighborhoods and newer subdivisions, and the area's relatively young population supports ongoing demand for retail, healthcare, and everyday services.

Clarksville's market is shaped by corridor logistics and manufacturing needs rather than port- or rail-dominated distribution. I-24 provides efficient truck access to Nashville and onward to broader Southeast markets, which supports last-mile and regional distribution uses. Similar space in and around Clarksville generally clusters near highway interchanges and established industrial parks, with activity from light manufacturing, assembly, building products, and service-oriented users; smaller footprints and contractor-oriented facilities are also common. Recent demand has been influenced by supply chain diversification and “near-market” warehousing, with typical decision drivers including labor availability, travel time to Nashville, site readiness, and utility capacity.

Economic Drivers

I-24 access and a large military presence support Clarksville's employment base and industrial activity.

Clarksville's location northwest of Nashville along the I-24 corridor positions the city for regional distribution, light manufacturing, and defense-adjacent services, with an employer mix that includes education, healthcare, local government, and major manufacturing operations.

Economic Drivers

Clarksville benefits from interstate connectivity (I-24) and a sizable labor pool influenced by Fort Campbell and regional in-migration. The industrial market is supported by established manufacturers and logistics users, with demand tied to truck access and site-ready industrial parks. Rail-served industrial sites are also present in the market; for example, a publicly owned heavy-industrial site within the Corporate Business Park is marketed with a potential rail spur and proximity to I-24.
