NEIGHBORHOOD OVERVIEW

Chelsea, Manhattan

Historical Overview

As one of Manhattan's wealthiest neighborhoods, Chelsea has a fascinating past, dynamic present and exciting future. It has been a magnet for talent over the years, from striving artists and street buskers, to the world's most accomplished academics and modern mavens. Many people define the boundaries of Chelsea differently, but it's generally considered to be defined by 14th and 30th Streets to the south and north, Sixth Avenue to the east, and the Hudson River as the western boundary. Nearby neighborhoods include Meatpacking District and Greenwich Village to the south, Midtown West & Hudson Yards to the north and Flatiron & Union Square to the east.

The name Chelsea has its roots in the estate and Georgian-style house built in 1750 by retired British major Thomas Clarke, who inherited the property from Jacob Somerinderyck's farm. Clarke named the house Chelsea, "after the home he inherited from Sir Thomas More." Clarke passed the estate to his daughter Charity, who added land to the south of his estate in 1811, extending it up to the present-day 19th Street. Despite his opposition to the Commissioner's Plan of 1811, which included a new Ninth Avenue running through the middle of Clarke's estate, Moore started the development of Chelsea with help from James N. Wells, who divided the land into lots along the current-day Ninth Avenue and sold them to wealthy New Yorkers. Moore is widely credited with writing "A Visit From St. Nicholas" and was one of the authors of "The First Greek and Hebrew Lexicon Printed in the U.S.". In 1827, he donated the land of the apple orchard he had owned to the Episcopal Diocesan Seminary of New York, which built a brownstone Gothic-style campus with trees shading it from south to north.
