Local Market Overview

Lacey benefits from a large and steadily expanding consumer base within the Olympia-Lacey-Tumwater metro, supported by its position along Interstate 5 and its adjacency to Washington’s capital complex. The city combines suburban household density with regional draw, giving service-oriented retail uses a dependable mix of commuter, resident, and pass-through demand. Strong household incomes, above-average home values, and a sizable concentration of working-age residents support recurring vehicle-related spending, while the area’s established retail corridors continue to capture a meaningful share of countywide taxable retail sales.

For a car wash investment, Lacey’s appeal is tied to daily convenience retail patterns rather than destination spending alone. The market is supported by state-government employment, healthcare, neighborhood retail, and logistics-related activity across the broader Thurston County trade area. Nearby arterials and freeway access enhance visibility and repeat visitation, while the city’s continued planning for transportation and mixed-use growth should help sustain traffic counts and commercial activity. In this context, a well-located car wash can benefit from durable local demand, frequent repeat usage, and limited reliance on discretionary long-distance trips.

Economic Drivers

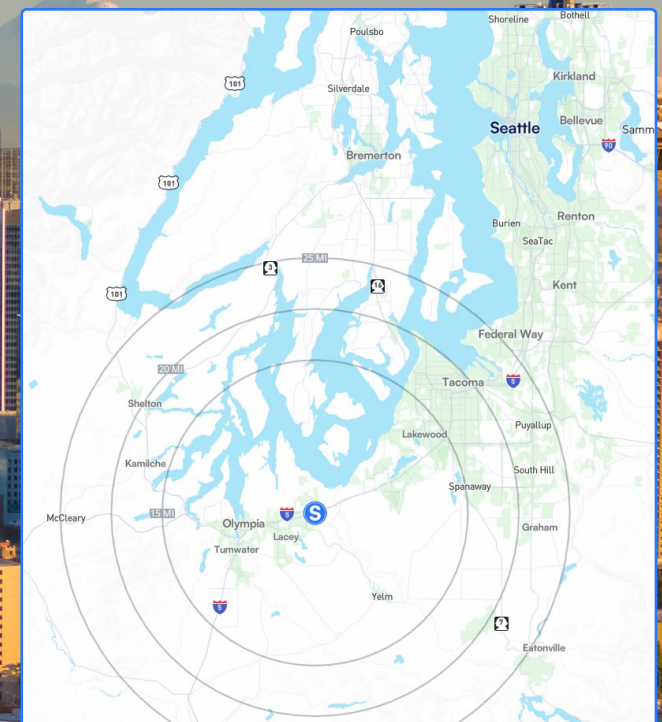

Lacey's core strength is its diversified, recession-resistant South Sound economy anchored by government, healthcare, retail, and regional services. Its location on the Interstate 5 corridor, roughly 58 miles south of Seattle, provides access to regional consumer flows while serving as a primary commercial node within Thurston County. Lacey is integrated into the broader Olympia-Tumwater market, where state government presence, healthcare systems, education, and consumer-serving businesses create a stable employment foundation. Thurston County hosts more than 140,000 jobs, with government accounting for a major share, while private employment is led by Providence Health & Services, Albertsons/Safeway, Lucky Eagle Casino and Hotel, Walmart, and Nisqually Red Wind Casino. For a car wash investment, that mix supports recurring local demand from commuters, households, and service workers moving through the Lacey-Hawks Prairie corridor.
